Issued: 8/11/2017 4:11 AM

A frontal boundary in the area along with continued northwest flow aloft will result in another day of thunderstorm chances along with below average to average temperatures. Rain chances go up during the evening and overnight as a more robust upper level disturbance moves across the area. Heavy rain and localized flooding/flash flooding will be the main concern with storms, especially for areas that have received copious amounts of rain in the previous few days.

Thunderstorms may disrupt your weekend plans. Heat will also be a concern for those engaged in outdoor activities. Storm chances today will be mainly north and east of the Dallas/Fort Worth Metroplex. More widespread activity may occur on Saturday afternoon. Lightning will be the primary hazard with these storms, but gusty winds may also accompany the stronger cells, particularly on Saturday. A nocturnal complex of storms is expected to impact the region early Sunday morning. Heavy rain will be likely, and there may be some flooding concerns, particularly across Northeast Texas.

Partly cloudy skies are expected with isolated showers and thunderstorms across central and eastern sections of deep south Texas. Temperatures will rebound into the middle 90s to near 100 degrees today across the region. On the coast, a High Surf Advisory and Coastal Flood Advisory continues until 10 am this morning. On the coastal waters, expect light to moderate southeasterly breezes with the Laguna Madre building from a light chop to a moderate chop and seas of 3 to 6 feet, occasionally 7 feet on the coastal gulf waters.
